Here is an extract from a dialogue:

Will you come back?

No, never!

Reading these sentences, you have made your own idea of a situation. If you had to read them aloud, what intonation would you give this dialogue?

You realise that you do not have enough information to imagine this situation.

You would need information about the people:
- Who are these two people?
- What gender are they?

You would need information about the situation:
- Are they in conflict?
- Are they happy or sad to be parting?
- Where does the scene take place? In a house? In a shop? In a café? On a station platform? Etc.
- What happened before they spoke these sentences?

The example continues on the next page.
Now say these two sentences taking account of the communication situations given below.
Feel the differences according to the contexts.

1- It is a couple. The man and the woman have just argued. She is crying. He is angry. They are on a station platform. The man is on the train. She remains on the platform. The train is about to leave.

2- Two friends have gone mountain climbing. The first is experienced and very good at the sport. For the second, it’s the first time. The climb was difficult, long and dangerous. On the way back, the experienced climber asks his friend if he will come climbing again. He is exhausted, he’s had enough and he answers no.

3- Two friends of 15 discover a new clothes shop that has just opened in their town. They realise that all the clothes are for women of over 60! They had a good laugh pretending that they were going to buy some dresses and wear them the next time they went out! Once out of the shop, they say these words, in fits of laughter!
In any communication situation, several elements have to be taken into consideration:

The sender is the person who sends out a message.

The receiver is the person who receives the message.

The context is the situation in which the communication takes place, the circumstances which lead to this communication. This context will determine an intention for communication.

The code used can be written or oral. Sometimes, not a word is spoken but the facial expressions or the posture of the sender communicate a message: this is non-verbal language.

---

The sender: the lady

The receiver: the waiter

The context: a restaurant, asking for information about puddings.

The sender’s intention: obtain some information politely.

The code: oral.

Our association is looking for new volunteers to add to our team of listeners. This is a 24/7 service, where volunteers take it in turns to be there, on the phone, for people who feel the need to talk to someone. The call is free.

All volunteers receive training and develop human relation skills. Your commitment would be 14 hours a month, so it is quite compatible with a working life.

If you are interested, contact us on 081 33 33 33.
